Sienná turns faith into sound on genre-bending new single "Be a Seeker, Believer"

SEPTEMBER 27, 2026 · NATALIE PATRICK

Sienná has bravely entered uncharted sonic territory with her new single “Be a Seeker, Believer.” The track is a fusion of experimental electronic sounds, synth pop shimmer, trip hop weight, indie pop comfort and avant-garde nerve. And this is the kind of track that doesn’t fit neatly into a box, which is exactly why it’s worth a close listen for anyone keeping an eye on the direction of independent electronic music in 2026.

The production plays with contrast. The track begins with icy synth layers laced with glitches, creating a sense of almost cinematic tension, a mood that feels searching and unresolved fitting, given the song’s title. Then a trip hop-inspired rhythm section comes in underneath, slower and heavier than your average synth pop offering, giving the track a grounded, head-nodding pulse that nicely contrasts with the brighter melodic elements floating above it. How Sienná chooses to organize things really accentuates the relationship between weight and light.

But even more impressive are the single's experimental touches surprising textural buildups, unorthodox song arrangements, and moments when the rhythm completely disappears and the space is filled with sound. They're not gimmicks, they work as breathing room, letting the emotional core of the piece land without the crutch of a predictable pop chorus. And the indie-pop sensibility keeps things accessible, so the experimentation never gets to be too much.
